1. Introduction. Satisfaction research has recognized the need to incorporate both affective and cognitive components in modelling consumer satisfaction (Wirtz et al., 2000). It is suggested that a purely cognitive approach may be inadequate in modelling satisfaction evaluations, so it is particularly important to include emotional variables (Liljander and Strandvik, 1997, Oliver et al., 1997 ...

This line of reasoning leads to the following research model of effective DI (), the main components of which are shared with a model described by Hall (2002). These components, or elements (Tomlinson, 1999), of DI can be viewed as part of a learning cycle. In practice, teachers should use each element flexibly, e.g., they may start with formative assessment prior to planning instruction.
